12 ways to improve images, covers, and thumbnails

Adapted for thumbnails, social images, and photography from design and click-psychology guides

Packaging decides whether great content gets seen. Design for the 120-pixel preview: one dominant subject, high contrast, and minimal text, tested at thumbnail size before publishing.

Composition and Light

- 1. One dominant subject per image. Everything else supports the focal point; if everything fights equally, nothing wins.
- 2. Place subjects on the rule-of-thirds grid. Faces near an intersection, not dead center; fill 30-60% of the frame.
- 3. Shoot flat, even light on faces. Clarity beats drama at small sizes; add shadow in post, fix underexposure never.
- 4. Separate subject from background. Tonal contrast, a subtle blur, or a subject stroke; keep backgrounds quieter than the subject.
- 5. Use diagonal energy. Tilted heads and corner-to-corner lines read as movement; static horizontals read as passive.
- 6. Leave breathing room for platform crops. Vertical-first for social; keep key elements away from edges.

Design Details

- 7. Limit text to 3-4 bold words. Heavy-weight font, outlined or shadowed, in the upper third; text is a supporting actor.
- 8. Stick to 2-3 colors. Complementary pairs (blue/orange, yellow/purple) guide focus; consistency builds brand.
- 9. Push expressions past comfort. What looks over-the-top live reads natural at thumbnail size; clear eyes win clicks.
- 10. Apply the 3-element rule. Face, key object, short text - nothing else in the frame.

Testing

- 11. Preview at 120 pixels before publishing. If the subject doesn't read on a phone screen, crop tighter or simplify.
- 12. Change one design variable per test. Composition, lighting, or expression - isolate the cause of the click-rate change.
